

I strongly urge the FCC to keep net neutrality backed by title II laws intact. The repeal of these laws is clearly an attempt by large companies with powerful men, looking to make more money on their millions and generally hurting the general public in doing so.

Although the hypothetical situations where an internet provider would change the speed of access to one website or another is currently hypothetical, it is clear to me that greed would lead some companies to do this. Many laws have been created on hypothetical situations (ie. The constitution and bill of rights), and this is a clear example of the hypothetical situation leading to factual event.

Please keep net neutrality laws intact for the general good of the people. The internet is a utility at this point in time.
